AMERICAN SCIENTISTS UNEARTH RELICS OF THE STONE AGE

DELVING INTO SECRETS OF PAST AGES: PROFESSOR JAMES GRANT MacCURDY of Yale University (Centre, Foreground, With Cap), Head of the Archaeological Expedition at Solutré, France, With Some of His Co-Workers. (Times Wide World Photos.)

MARKED interest has been aroused in the scientific world by the recent discoveries at Solutré, France, by students of the American School of Prehistoric Research, under the direction of Professor James Grant MacCurdy of Yale University, that may cause a revision or at least a modification of many accepted theories bearing on the Stone Age. Incidentally, if the conclusions drawn from the finds are correct, they tend to disturb the convictions of French savants that the skeletons of the Solutréan area—which takes its name from a vast camp ringed with the turf-covered bones of tens of thousands of horses slaughtered for food by the invading Solutréans of prehistoric times—belong to the Bronze Age of perhaps 5,000 years ago.

A skeleton found by the MacCurdy expedition had beneath it the evidence of an ancient murder in the form of a flint knife of the Mousterian period, in a position to indicate that it had been slipped into the back of the victim under which it lay. This would indicate that the skeleton antedated even the Aurignacian period and was at least 20,000 and, perhaps, 30,000 years old.

To the somewhat skeptical inquiry of the French scientists as to how it happens that Professor MacCurdy's skeletons were unearthed less than two feet below the surface, while their Aurignacian relics were nearly nine feet below and therefore presumably older, the professor suggests that at some time in the distant past the rocky ledge of Solutré was the scene of an earthquake and small landslide, which sliced off the top of a hillock and carried it a hundred yards away to fill a gully in which other skeletons were buried.

If geologists who are to study the soil formations and slides of the area confirm this possibility, the American discoveries will take their place as among the most important and interesting of the decade.
